

Interview Questions

Journalist (who continue to pay attention to workers' rights and interests)

1)What responsibility do you think the news media bear in reporting social issues such as the 996-work schedule?

The news media has a vital responsibility in reporting on social issues such as the 996-work schedule. We should not only disseminate facts, but also stimulate public discussion and promote social awareness of the importance of labor rights and work-life balance.

2)What challenges have you faced in covering the 996 news?

In reporting on 996, the challenges I encountered included obtaining comprehensive and objective information and dealing with potential bias from different stakeholders in my reporting. Ensuring multiple angles and depth is a constant effort.

3)Do you think the current working environment and work pressure in the news industry also have a trend of 996?

There are indeed some 996 trends in the working environment and work stress in the news industry, especially in breaking news and major event coverage. But many media organizations are also trying to improve working conditions and promote a healthy work culture.

4)How do you think journalists should balance factual statements and personal positions when reporting on 996?

In reporting on 996, I will adhere to the principles of fact-based reporting while maintaining compassion and understanding for those affected. Through in-depth interviews and investigations, we strive to present the whole picture of the problem.

5)How much impact do you think news coverage has had on the public's understanding of 996?

News coverage has had a profound impact on the public's understanding of 996. Through our coverage, the public can gain a more comprehensive understanding of the social and economic factors behind this phenomenon, as well as its potential impact on individuals and society.

6)How do you ensure the accuracy and impartiality of information when reporting on 996?

To ensure the accuracy and impartiality of the report, I conduct sufficient research, interview multiple sources, and verify all data and facts. Objectivity is the cornerstone of our profession.

7)How do you think the news media should raise public awareness of labor rights issues?

News media should raise public awareness of labor rights issues through in-depth reporting, panel discussions and multimedia content. Educate and guide the public about their rights and how to uphold them.

8)How do you think journalists should deal with possible public pressure or editorial interference when reporting the 996-work schedule?

In the face of possible public opinion pressure or editorial interference, I will uphold the independence and integrity of the journalism profession and ensure the autonomy and objectivity of the report. Be transparent about reporting processes and methods to enhance public trust.

9)What do you think the news industry should do to raise awareness of the professional health and well-being of journalists?

The news industry should pay more attention to the occupational health and well-being of journalists. This includes providing reasonable working hours, stress management training and health support services, as well as creating a supportive work atmosphere.

10)How do you think governments and businesses should work with the news media to promote open discussion of social issues such as 996?

The government and companies should establish open channels of communication with the news media to jointly promote open discussion of social issues such as the 996-work system. By working together, we can more effectively drive social progress and policy improvements.
